As a beginner, it's important to know when to use each one — especially if you're doing your best to fit in and sound natural in a Spanish-speaking country. In general, you should use the "tú" form with people who are your colleagues. In your travels, you'll notice that some cultures tend to be more informal than others. For example, Spain tends to use formal speech less often than what you'll find in Mexico. In Latin America, a good rule of thumb is to default to formal speech when in doubt. Use "Usted" with older people and those who you want to show more respect to. For example, at work, you would address your boss with "usted" and not with "tú." Even if your boss is younger than you, "usted" would be the correct word to use, unless you've been asked by your boss to use "tú". Most people in Mexico also use "usted" with their grandparents, their friends' parents, and sometimes even their own parents or other family members who are older than them. In general, you can use it with anyone who looks older than you — even if you just met them randomly on the street. If you've been friends with being addressed by "usted," they might ask you to use the informal you and call them by "tú" instead. These are some phrases they may use: Puedes tutearme: You can address me informally. Puedes hablarme de tú: You can address me informally. Háblame de "tú", por favor: Please use "tú" when talking to me.
